“ My favorite uncle, who could build anything. My mother, his younger sister, used to tell a hysterical story of Dale getting her to serve as guinea pig for the electric chair he invented when he was 12- fortunately that didn't work, but most everything else he constructed was built to last. I remember putting a furnace together with him one afternoon-it was missing the assembly directions, but he said "well, lets just see if we can figure this out," and two hours later he had it assembled, instructing me as we went ("now something like this ought to be next," he'd say, picking up an item from a pile of about 4000 pieces). He also persuaded me to try chewing tobacco once-I never tried again after swallowing some of the juice. He was really fun and really intelligent. And a devout gentleman.

“ My Uncle Dale, I love you so much. My fondest memories are of you and my daddy (Chad) laughing and telling stories about each other growing up. The majority of stories were of you and your mischievous deeds. Dad would tell that he would get Daddy Watson's mule and he would make you go with him on the mule (bareback) to visit mama (all the way close to Blacky) when they were courting. Hahahaha! I'm sure that was a sight! Another was of you two during World War II, meeting up in England and wrestling each other as the General walked in dad's tent. So many wonderful (and funny) stories! I will miss you and love you. Til we meet again....
